E.

E, Has two ſounds; long, as ſcêne, and ſhort, as mĕn. E is the moſt frequent vowel in the Engliſh language; for it not only is uſed like the reſt in the beginning or end of words, but has the peculiar quality of lengthening the foregoing vowel, as căn, cāre; măn, māne; găp, gāpe; glăd, glāde; brĕd, brēde; chĭn, chīne; whĭp, wīpe; thĭn, thīne; nŏd, nōde; tŭn, tūne; plŭm, plūme. Yet it ſometimes occurs final, where yet the foregoing vowel is not lengthened; as gŏne, knowlĕdge, ĕdge, gĭve. Anciently almoſt every word ended with e; as, for can, canne; for year, yeare; for great, greate; for need, neede; for flock, flocke. It is probable that this e final had at firſt a ſoft ſound, like the female e of the French; and that afterwards it was in poetry either mute or vocal, as the verſe required, 'till at laſt it became univerſally ſilent.

Ea has the ſound of e long: the e is commonly lengthened rather by the immediate addition of a than by the appoſition of e to the end of the word; as mĕn, mēan; ſĕll, ſēal; mĕt, mēat; nĕt, nēat.

The analogy between a ſtone, thus containing another within it, or, as the fanciful writers expreſs it, pregnant with another, and a woman big with child, led people to imagine that it muſt have great virtues and effects in accelerating or retarding delivery; ſo that, if tied to the arm of a woman with child, it prevents abortion; and if to the leg, it promotes delivery. On ſuch idle and imaginary virtues was raiſed all the credit which this famous foſſil poſſeſſed for many ages. Hill's Materia Medica.

For the firſt year afterwards the moon will go before the ſun but 11 days; the ſecond year 22 days; the third 33 days: but 30 being an entire lunation, caſt that away, and the remainder 3 ſhall be that year's epact; and ſo on, adding yearly 11 days. Thirty reject: the prime makes epact then. Harris.

(1.) Concerning the word of God, whether it be by miſconſtruction of the ſenſe, or by falſification of the words, wittingly to endeavour that any thing may ſeem divine which is not, is very plainly to abuſe, and even to falſify Divine evidence, which injury, offered but unto men, is moſt worthily counted heinous. Hooker.

Of this word Mr. Dryden writes thus: My friends quarrelled at the word falſified, as an innovation in our language. The fact is confeſſed; for I remember not to have read it in any Engliſh author; though perhaps it may be found in Spenſer's Fairy Queen. But ſuppoſe it be not there: why am I forbidden to borrow from the Italian, a poliſhed language, the word which is wanting in my native tongue? Horace has given us a rule for coining words, ſi græco fonte cadant, eſpecially when other words are joined with them which explain the ſenſe. I uſed the word falſify, in this place, to mean that the ſhield of Turnus was not of proof againſt the ſpears and javelins of the Trojans, which had pierced it through and through in many places. The words which accompany this new one, makes my meaning plain:

Ma ſi l Uſbergo d'Ambi era perfetto,
Che mai poter falſarlo in neſſum canto. Arioſto, cant. xxvi.

Falſar cannot otherwiſe be turned than by falſified: for his ſhield was falſed, is not Engliſh. I might indeed have contented myſelf with ſaying his ſhield was pierced, and bored, and ſtuck with javelins. Dryden.

Dryden, with all this effort, was not able to naturaliſe the new ſignification, which I have never ſeen copied, except once by ſome obſcure nameleſs writer, and which indeed deſerves not to be received.

All lands and tenements, wherein a man hath a perpetual eſtate to him and his heirs, &c. are divided into allodium and feudum: allodium is every man's own land, which he poſſeſſes merely in his own right, without acknowledgment of any ſervice, or payment of any rent to any other. Feudum, or fee, is that which we hold by the benefit of another, and in name whereof we owe ſervices, or pay rent, or both, to a ſuperior lord. And all our land in England, the crown-land, which is in the king's own hands, in right of his crown, excepted, is in the nature of feudum: for though a man have land by deſcent from his anceſtors, or bought it for his money; yet is the land of ſuch a nature, that it cannot come to any, either by deſcent or purchaſe, but with the burthen that was laid upon him who had novel fee, or firſt of all received it as a benefit from his lord, to him and to all ſuch to whom it might deſcend, or be any way conveyed from him. So that no man in England has directum dominium, that is, the very property or demeſne in any land, but the prince in right of his crown: for though he that has fee has jus perpetuum & utile dominium, yet he owes a duty for it, and therefore it is not ſimply his own. Fee is divided into two ſorts: fee-abſolute, otherwiſe called fee-ſimple, and fee-conditional, otherwiſe termed fee-tail: fee-ſimple, is that whereof we are ſeized in thoſe general words, To us and our heirs for ever: fee-tail is that whereof we are ſeiſed to us and our heirs, with limitation; that is, the heirs of our body. And fee-tail is either general or ſpecial: general is where land is given to a man, and the heirs of his body: fee-tail ſpecial is that where a man and his wife are ſeiſed of land to them and the heirs of their two bodies. Cowel.

(1.) Such are reckoned perfect flowers which have petala, a ſtamen, apex and ſtylus; and whatever flower wants either of theſe is reckoned imperfect. Perfect flowers are divided into ſimple ones, which are not compoſed of other ſmaller, and which uſually have but one ſingle ſtyle; and compounded, which conſiſt of many floſculi, all making but one flower. Simple flowers are monopetalous, which have the body of the flower all of one entire leaf, though ſometimes cut or divided a little way into many ſeeming petala, or leaves; as in borage, bugloſs: or polypetalous, which have diſtinct petala, and thoſe falling off ſingly, and not all together, as the ſeeming petala of monopetalous flowers always do: but thoſe are further divided into uniform and difform flowers: the former have their right and left hand parts, and the forward and backward parts all alike; but the difform have no ſuch regularity, as in the flowers of ſage and deadnettle. A monopetalous difform flower is likewiſe further divided into, firſt, ſemi-fiſtular, whoſe upper part reſembles a pipe cut off obliquely, as in the ariloſtochia: 2d, labiate; and this either with one lip only, as in the acanthum and ſcordium, or with two lips, as in the far greater part of the labiate flowers: and here the upper lip is ſometimes turned upwards, and ſo turns the convex part downwards, as in the chamæciſſus; but moſt commonly the upper lip is convex above, and turns the hollow part down to its fellow below, and repreſents a kind of helmet, or monkſhood; and from thence theſe are frequently called galleate, cucullate, and galericulate flowers; and in this form are the flowers of the lamium, and moſt verticillate plants. Sometimes the lamium is intire, and ſometimes jagged or divided. 3d, Corniculate; that is, ſuch hollow flowers as have on their upper part a kind of ſpur, or little horn, as the linaria, delphinum, &c. and the carniculum, or calcar, is always impervious at the tip or point. Compounded flowers are, firſt, diſcous, or diſcoidal; that is, whoſe floſculi are ſet ſo cloſe, thick, and even, as to make the ſurface of the flower plain and flat, which, becauſe of its round form, will be like a diſcus; which diſk is ſometimes radiated, when there is a row of petala ſtanding round in the diſk, like the points of a ſtar, as in the matricaria, chamæmelum, &c. and ſometimes naked, having no ſuch radiating leaves round the limb of its diſk, as in the tanacetum: 2d, planifolious, which is compoſed of plain flowers, ſet together in circular rows round the centre, and whoſe face is uſually indented, notched, and jagged, as the hieracia. 3d, Fiſtular, which is compounded of long hollow little flowers, like pipes, all divided into large jags at the ends. Imperfect flowers, becauſe they want the petala, are called ſtamineous, apetalous, and capillaceous; and thoſe which hang pendulous by fine threads, like the juli, are by Tournefort called amentaceous, and we call them catstail.
